To the Reader.

GENTLE READER;

He Remonstrance of the Netherlands East India Company, hecreafter in the first place following, was by the same Company presented to the Lords States Generall of the United Provinces in November Anno 1624. for answere of the Relation of the English East India Companie touching the vniust, cruell, and barbarous proceedings against the English at Amboyna, and for justification of that infamous Proesse. The Coppie of which Remonstrance being imparted to the said English Company, they forthwith writ the subsequent Reply, and sent the same to be presented to the said Lords States Generall, for a Counterpoyson against the said Remonstrance.

The Author of this History, having been informed that the late King of France had been pleased to give him the honour of his acquaintance, and that he had been invited to go to Paris to see him, he thought it his duty to write this History, in order to show the world that the King of France was not only a great Prince, but also a great Man.
He has therefore written this History, in order to show the world that the King of France
was not only a great Prince, but also a great Man. He has written this History, in order to show the world that the King of France
was not only a great Prince, but also a great Man.

altogether verifying their suspition of the drift of the Netherlands Company before mentioned. For the said Letter of the Lords States being by the English President at Iaccatra safely delivered to Carpentier, Governour Generall of the Dutch in the Indies, he, when Harman van Speault the late Governour of Amboyna, and head of the bloody treachery against the English there, arrived at Iaccatra, received him with great honour, yea with triumph; and in stead of sending him for Europe to answer the Cōplaints of the English, according to the direction and cōmandement of the Lords States by their said Letter, made him chiefe cōmander of a Flecte of Shippes sent from thence to Swatt, and other Northerne parts of the Indies; the English President & Councill at Iaccatra in vaine protesting here-against, and vrging his remission to Europe in consequence of the Letter of the Lords States aforesaid. Neither haue the Officers of the said Netherlands Company in the Indies in all this respite of 18. moneths, made any restitution or reparation to the English, as was promised and pretended, nor any preparation therevnto; but rather haue added new grievances. So that it now plainly appeareth,

that the said Netherlands East India Company, in their earnest suite to the Lords States, to procure his Majestie to giue a respite for the due tryall of the Cause of Amboyna, inserted in the latter end of this ensuing Remonstrance, intended nothing lesse then such a true tryall, but rather a cooling and blunting of the edge and zeale of the English Company in pursuing of their due remedies; hoping (as it is in the fable of him that vnderooke to teach the Ass to speake) that in long delay and respite of time somthing might happen, vtterly to elude and frustrate the reall performance. In the meane time, besides the goods of the English that they detaine, they enioy the whole trade of the Moluccoes, Banda, and Amboyna, the true though wretched moriue of their abominable Proesse against the innocents; and haue raised the Nutmeggs, Maces and Cloues, being by this means solely in their own hands, to more then double the price of that they were at in these parts when the English had their share in them. Whereby it appeareth, how sincerely this following Remonstrance slighteth this matter as a poore end, though it so much tend to enrich that Dutch Company;

A REMONSTRANCE
of the Bewinthebbers or Directors
of the Netherlands East India Company
lately exhibited to the Lords States Generall in iustification of the proceedings of their Officers at Amboyna against the English there.

Translated out of French.

High and mighty Lords :

THE Directors of the vnitied Company and Society of the East-Indies did in the moneth of Iuly past, present vnto your Honours a Deduction concerning that which was past in the Province of Amboyna, and of the execution there made in March 1623, with a proufionall answer of the Obiections which then were made and knowne against it : But where this Cause by that meanes could not be ended, and for as much as daily there are found & spred abroad great Bruits against that which is mentioned in the Deduction

afore-

aforesaid; therefore the said Directors in regard of their charge and office, as also for the defence of their Seruants, so farre as reason permitteth, and not to be thought destitute and naked of good defence, yea that they may not leaue the matter for condemned, as diuers haue spred abroad, and gladly would make the world beleecue, cannot forbear to make, after due reuerence, this more particular Instruction in forme of Remonstrance vnto your Honors.

A.

In the first place then, the Directors doe yet persist in their said Deduction, because the same may serue to giue light to the whole cause: And considering the waightry and infallible Inditia and euidence that preceded this discouery of the Treason of certaine English, yea the same being notorious, as also the proceedings which haue legally and according to Law passed against the Confederates, as appeareth by the Iudiciall Acts (signed as well by those which were examined, as by the Councill of Amboyna which is a Colledge admitted and sworne) and against which no prooffe, much lesse any vaine and friuolous suspition should bee admitted, They the Directors absolutely beleecue (so long as they see no more to the contrary) that the said English Conspirators and other Confederates which were in our seruice, were well apprehended, and the fact (in our opinions) so well proued according to Law, and the vse & custome in such case obserued, the proceedings haue been legall, & in pursuit therof the punishment which they haue sustained was inflicted according to the common Law, with good moderation of the rigour of Iustice & with clemency. Notwithstand-

ding there haue beene many Writings and Deductions, as the Directors vntill this time perceiue and discover, sowed and spred against this cause as well in England as in these parts: among which (for as much as we know) the first is a summary of Newes out of Letters dated the 19 of Iune 1623, written by the English Factors at Batavia, which immediately will be iudged by euery one who neuer so little and superficially shall reade the same, to be full of passion contrary to the Truth, and without any prooffe: For first the proceeding by the Iustice at Amboyna vpon the Confederates there, is blamed therein, and by preiudication called an vniust Murder, wicked and barbarous, the fashion and manner of the racke or torture likewise described and exaggerated with great vehemency and passion: And also it is not true that therein is said, that the other Indians (besides the English) confederates in the fact were Seruants of the English Company, whereas it appeareth otherwise, to wit, that the Indian confederates were Seruants of the Dutch Company, as is well knowne to be true; and yet this writing hath taken great place amongst great and small, and hath beene showed as a patterne or modell whereupon the other griefes haue beene formed against the said Iustice of Amboyna. Vpon which incontinently followed a more large and ample Writing called The true Relation of the cruell and barbarous torture and execution committed by the Flemings vpon the English in Amboyna.

In the Introduction whereof proceedeth impertinently a description of Amboyna, and of the Garison and force of the Dutch in the same place, and this onely to the end, as appeareth, to show thereby that there is no appearance that the English should consult of the taking of the said place as a thing impossible; As if, by reason of the small vnderstanding and simple foundation which the Conspirators had to put their designe in execution and in effect (omitting all other accusations) they had not in any kind merited and deserued any punishment: the contrary whereof appeareth to be practised daily in the like crimes; And to cite this presumption vnto the annihilating of a truth so notorious and proued, and against the proper confessions of the executed and other Confederates, against the conscience and testimony of so many honest men and of credit, which haue beene employed in the cause, and against a Colledge of Iudges publicke and sworne, this cannot in any manner be admitted, receiued, nor had in consideration by such as haue vnderstanding in these affaires. But to the contrary and besides all the reasons aforegoing, the Dutch Company hath made it to appeare by good proofes, that the English to the end to diuert and get forth of the Castle the forces of the Dutch, had in the Countries and Ilands therabouts stirred vp, induced, and caused to rebell, all the Ternatanes, Ceraniens, and the Indian nations bordering there, openly and by publicke violence to make such vnaccustomed outrages vpon the Subjects of the Castle, that the Governour might be constrained to goe forth from thence with all his forces for to appease and quiet the said Rebels, and to bring them to their ancient obedience. And there-

upon the English should haue assailed and inuaded the Castle and the Towne (as being destitute by the retiring and departure of the Army) then when the Dutch should be most feeble and in their greatest necessity as well of men as of Dutch ships, which should haue bene employed in this voyage. And concerning the force of the English which were in Amboyna, they alone would not haue enterprised the attempt, but would vnto this purpose haue called vnto them all the slaues which they had in great number in their Factories: Neither would they haue begunne the same before the ariuall of certaine English Ships in Amboyna: The people whereof they would also haue set on worke and employed to the attempt: The retinue also, which daily the complices did vnderhand procure (as Gabriel Towerfon Cape Merchant of the English had ordered) should haue bene much augmented, the rebell subiects of the Castle should haue weakned the force of the Dutch and augmented the force of the conspirators; And further (which is the principall point) the end and designe of the Conspirators was not to force and constraîne the Castle (onely) by violence, open warre, or siege, (to which purpose all these imagined fortresses of the Castle, and the power of the Dutch, might haue their consideration) but the plot was, to inuade the Castle by Treason, and with the aid and assistance of the Japonian Souldiers which were then in the seruice of the Duch at Amboyna aforesaid: which small number of Japonians were not slightly to be regarded, in respect of the valour and prowesse of that Nation, and their extraordinary resolution in hazarding their liues in any dangerous enterprises; Inſomuch as a certaine ſmall number of the Iaponians onely of themſelues and without any aide or ſupport haue vndertaken and accompliſhed the moſt great attempts and deſignes in places of the greateſt and moſt uiſſant government in the Indies. As among other things it appeareth by that which paſſed in the kingdome of Patany: where certaine Iaponians forced and pillaged the Towne, afterwards made their retreat in good order and with good compoſition. And in the Kingdome of Siam in the Towne called Iodea, full of thouſands of perſons, the King whereof himſelfe can in a ſhort time bring into the field aboue one hundred thouſand men of armes, and heretofore obtained great victories vpon many great Princes his neighbours, who then were and as yet are of great power; in that towne (I ſay) which is the capitall Towne of the Kingdome, certaine Iaponians ſurprized firſt the Caſtle and Royall Palace, and being entered thereinto by force, afterwards they tooke the King in perſon priſoner, they kept him in their cuſtody, and being wholly become maſters of the ſaid Caſtle, they made by meanes of threatnings (as to put the King to death, and otherwiſe) an honourable and aduantageous compoſition: By which the ſaid ſmall number of Iaponians went away & departed without any damage out of the Kingdome of Siam, with great glory and magnanimity, and very great riches. Which exploits are without compariſon much more great and dangerous then the ſaid attempt of Amboyna againſt an open Towne and a Caſtle empty and naked of forces, into which also the Japonians might haue their daily access with the English who were held and reputed for friends: So that whatsoeuer is mentioned in the Deduction of the English vpon this presumptiō, to draw into a doubt all the actions of the Confederates, is altogether without foundation, in a Cause so notorious and publikely conuincd. Of the like force and efficacie is that which is set downe before in the said English Deduction, as if the Dutch had no other designe by this imputation of Treason but to thrust forth the English out of Amboyna, and to remaine sole Masters of the Trade in those quarters: But if such had beene the intention of the Dutch Company, they might easier and with more apparance and pretext haue forborne to receiue and admit the English at the beginning in Amboyna in the yeare 1620, then haue thrust them forth in such a manner: and God forbid that any one should vnder- take to performe or effect such a thing by such vniust and maligne proceedings, and with such effusion of blood, onely to thrust forth the English from Am- boyna. And concerning the Dutch Company here in Europe, neuer any such thing came into their thoughts, nor did they euer giue any Commission for the putting forth of the English, by warrant whereof the Officers of the said place in generall might haue had ground to begin any thing to such an end. And concerning the Officers themselues, they are by those that know them esteemed and repu- ted to be honest and worthy men: who in like man- nēr would no wayes entertaine a thought of such an Action.

And

And to say the Truth, why should the Officers with such feigned wrong accuse and put to death the English and the Confederates being innocent: seeing that (as aforesaid) they had no Commission, and if they had any giuen them (which cannot be well imagined) yet the Gouvernor and Counsell of Amboyna are such people as would not haue yeelded or giuen obedience thereunto. And the same Gouvernour nor other Iudges which are fourteene in number, could not haue drawne any profit or advantage by their so doing. For admit it were so that the English came in this regard for to leaue Amboyna, this could no wayes aduantage them in their particular; but to the contrary, returning vnto Europe, they themselues should be (besides the burthen and remorse of their owne Consciences) charged and aggrauated with great blame and infamy, hatred and malice, and put in great danger of their persons; So that, of such a thing they could not expect otherwise then detriment, disadvantage and disgrace, yea punishment and chastisement vpon themselues. Now if this be not so, then may not this presumption of the English be true, nor in any wise admitted and receiued, who maintaine and inhumanely say, that this molestation and destruction was offered and done to the English, to the end to deliuer and free Amboyna of them, and to retaine it onely by the Dutch. For the Dutch Company doe declare the amity of the English Company to be vnto them of chiefe and speciall importance; and they desire for to enioy the same with all confidence: And furthermore wee could produce and alleadge many many reasons why we yet desire that the treaty being religiously and piously obserued from the one part to the other, we could willingly and gladly be content to giue way to the rate and portion in Trade permitted to the English Company by the Treaty of the yeare 1619. without by exclusion of the English (the Treaty being by them obserued) to acknowledge or thinke of any profit or aduantage in generall or in particular.

We vndertake further for our officers of Amboyna (as also it is true) that the beginning and entrance of this proceeding beganne vpon vehement and well grounded suspitions against the first Iaponian in our seruice, who walking at vndue houres vpon the Bulwarkes of the Castle, and inquiring very curiously of the force and constitution of the Garison and setting of the watch, was apprehended, and presently the clew of this great and execrable conspiracy was opened and discouered, as the English Deduction it selfe confesseth.

And if the Dutch had designed and vndertaken (as most calumniously it is suspected and reported) to thrust the English out of Amboyna by the vniust report and accusation of their seruants there, without any appearance of any true conspiracy: why did this Iaponian come vpon the walls and so curiously enquire, and also being apprehended and examined so pertinently speake of the conspiracy? If this Iaponian had bin a person suborned for to charge and accuse the English, the Dutch would not haue executed him; which yet legally followed, whereby it appeareth that his declaration and testimony was true, as well in accusing the other Iaponians his fellowes which were in our seruice, as in the charge of the other English, and of himselfe: why also were the other Iaponians indicted and executed, if the Dutch sought it but onely vpon the English, as is without colour pretended? for the Iaponians haue euer been in good esteeme with vs, and haue alwaies beene much trusted, and not hauing any occasion of malice, or rancor, or feare of them, or against them; where now to the contrary by this transgression it behoueth our nation to be alwayes in mistrust of the Iaponians, and not so confidently to vse or be serued of them as before. And it ought not to seem strange that during this Examination of these Iaponians (which as aforesaid, was begunne and ended before any thing was done to the English) that the English for the space of three or foure dayes (although herein they spare the truth) were so forward and so bold as to goe in and out, to and from the Castle: For they thought that it would tend and serue vnto their conseruation, to the end they might giue the less suspicion: for if they had fled away, & hidden or concealed themselues, in such case they had bin publikely discovered. And if they had thought or would haue attempted to flye, it was impossible for them so to doe, for the Governour and Councell had giuen order all about for the assurance of the place, and of all persons which frequented and had any intercourse of Merchandizes in Ambayna, of which the English complices could not be ignorant; so that they were constrained to put on a good face, cheere, and countenance, the better to shunne the perill and danger.

But

But it further appeareth that that which the English maintaine is abusive and erroneous; that they had continued three or foure dayes in going to and from the Castle after the said imprisonment, and during the examination of the Japonians: For they beganne to examine the Japonians the 24 of February, and the 25 the English were arrested, so that there was but one day betweene them both, and therefore that which is mentioned in the English Deduction is not true. Also for the confession of the first Japonian, as likewise of all the rest of the Japonians vnto the number of twelue, they do not onely accuse the English, but themselves also; so that there cannot be any suspicion or doubt of false accusation, seeing that they themselves could not haue any aduantage in the preservation of their owne persons; as otherwise there can be no suspicion of calumny: which in such a case could not be nor happen in any fashion or manner.

That which is contained in the English Deduction, to wit, that the English had neuer kept any conuersation with the Japonians, appeareth to the contrary by the Acts of the Processe and the confessions of all, and particularly of Towerfon, made without Torture or Fetters, long after his examination. So that from these contrarities and dissimulations are discovered, many other signes and tokens for to beleue that the English Deduction doth wander and stray very much from the truth, and that all which may be construed to the contrary is true, in consequence of that which the Dutch Company of the East Indies doe sustaine in the iust defence of their Officers and Ministers.

M.

N.

O. But that whereby the said Deduction is enlarged and amplified, is to make mention and discover many particularities which in time hereafter shall be refuted and proued to be matter meereley fained in the most part of the most important and substantiall points: as also in that which they speake of the racke and torture giuen to the English, which is described in particulars contrary to the truth, thereby to moue the Reader to pitty. But when they haue said all, it is but a bare and naked Discourse without prooffe, that the English haue beene tortured and racked: for to giue the torture when the case so requireth, is no fault of the Iudge, but it is a thing customable throughout Europe, and so in the Low-countries; And if such torture hath been giuen to some of the English, it was surely done vpon good and pregnant euidence, and weighty proofes, and confessions of others, whereof some may haue beene brought to a more rigorous examination, according to the exigence of the case, without doing or executing any iniustice.

P. If also the Iudges of the Dutch would haue wrongfully pressed and constrained the English to confession by torture, wherefore did they not presse and constrain them all to confession: which neuertheless appeareth by the Deduction of the English not to haue beene done, and that many were let passe without torture; yea many of them which the English Deduction abusiueley affirmeth to haue beene tortured: it being not reasonable to proceed against them as against others which were charged with more great and vehement suspitions and proofes.

And

And if they proceeded herein with such excessse, how commeth it then that the Iudges pardoned and discharged some (as faulty as the rest) but onely to giue testimony of their proceedings, and that the iustice thereof might fully appeare to all whomsoever? which otherwise they were not bound to doe nor would haue done in all likelihood.

Q.

But to winne the Reader by compassion the manner of the torture is there very finely and prolixely set downe: but who knoweth not that the manner and fashion of the extraordinary question is in it selfe rough and harsh, and specially must seeme so to the English in England (where there is no such kind of torture vsed, vnlesse it be in case of high Treason,) how moderate and gentle soeuer it be, as the paine of the torture of the water, which is much more ciuill and lesse dangerous then other tortures of stretching or pressing, which is in diuers manners vsed in Europe: for such torture and paine of water doth but cause and produce an oppression and anxiety of breath, and respiration, and not the swelling of the body of the Patients (as is abusiuely mentioned in the English Deduction) and is without fraction, bruising or mutilation of the members which others are subiect vnto: So that all which is comprised and contained in the same description is onely set downe for the embellishing and adorning of the said Writing, to the end onely to moue the Reader to compassion, to make him insensibly to draw in and swallow all the other errors and vntuths vnder these close conueighances, and giue them credit to the aduantage of the drift of the said Deduction:

R.

But he which to the contrary will sound and search out the truth, and whether that which is therein declared and related be proued, and ought to be admitted and receiued or not, let him be pleased further to obserue, as followeth.

That all which is said therein is without prooffe, and if that any prooffe be found therein, it is of very few persons, yea such as in a cause that concerneth themselves, and wherein they were once iudicially conuinc'd, may not be admitted for witnesses against the Iudge and the proceedings past against themselves, nor against the legall confession which they once and oftener made and confirmed with their owne subscription, which now by other depositions or particular declarations, cannot be made vaine and elusory against the testimony and certificate of fourteene Iudges, who were present in and at all passages, whose reputation and wisdom is so well knowne, that such wicked, vnorderly and vniust proceedings as the English pretend, may not be in any sort or manner charged or imputed vpon them.

Lastly, concerning certaine Declarations and Writings of the condemned English before their death, whereby they haue protested their innocency, and that they were iudged wrongfully, whereupon by presumption is inferred that it must be true, because it is not to be beleued that any one was so wicked and impious as to dare to faine and dissemble at the houre of his death, &c.

This Argument maketh little in the cause, for first it ought to appear that there are indeed such Declarations and Writings of the English: But the truth can can be testified by them which were present, and about them at all times, that there is no such thing; much lesse that which is said concerning certaine pretended miracles which had happened in witness of the innocency of the executed, so that it may well seeme that they had moued heauen and earth to hide and conceale this detestable deed: but howsoeuer it be, who would presume that honest men of reputation and wisdom knowne and publicke would haue showne themselves so impious and vnhumane, as wrongfully and innocently to accuse the persons executed: and much lesse it cannot bee presumed vnto the charge of a Colledge established and sworne.

And although that which is aforesaid appeare and be known first by the truth of the thing, as it is caried by the Deduction aforesaid, presented in Iuly past vnto your Honours; and that secondly it is credible that by this writing here were broke and decided all obiections and difficulties inferred by the English, as also some acts alleadged, which in regard of the English might be produced and alleadged against that which is aforesaid, and against the Legality of the proceedings in Amboyna, in such manner that more cannot be required in iustification of the behauiors of the Dutch Officers: So it is that the Directors notwithstanding find it necessary (although superfluous) to repeat and make mention here of many particularities which much more fully and all at a blow doe show that the reports spred and sworn with such vehemency by the English against the truth doe contrary the one the other, so that nothing more can be had had nor rest of suspition, whereby the proceedings and executions at Amboyna may bee accused, much lesse condemned, and in consequence likewise, which the great haste and assiduall precipitation vsed herein, hath been wholly done in poste, for to learne and show the world the truth of the discouery in the businessse; as hereafter shall appeare more clearly and euidently.

In the first place then, so it is that the Company after the first Deduction of Iuly, haue further vnderstood by the last Ships out of Battania ariued here in September, and that by Certificate or Attestation deposed by Mr. Frederick de Houtman, chiefe Counciller of the Indies, and ancient Gouvernour of the Isles of Mulloques; that it was firmly and vndoubtedly beleued in Amboyna throughout and of euery one, yea by himselfe as he yet doth beleue, that the English of the said place, and the Iaponians, had truly and really conspired to inuade the Castle of Amboyna at their best opportunity; so that none ought in any wise to doubt hereof.

Secondly, for strong prooffe of that which is aforesaid, the said Gouvernour de Houtman comming from the Molucques to Hitto in Amboyna in the moneth of April, anno 1623, a certaine Englishman called George Sharock, Assistant, (which before had bene also prisoner, and examined vpon the said conspiracie, and by fauour released and pardoned by the Gouvernour and Councill of Amboyna, notwithstanding that the said Sharock was a good while priuy to the said Conspiracie, and had promised his assistance) kneeling downe vpon his knees and prostrating himselfe selfe before the feet of the said Gouverneur de Houtman, (who looked for no such matter) declared with great zeale and good affection, that hee was and should bee all his life time bound and obliged vnto the Dutch Company, because (as hee then againe confessed) that fauour had bene done to him and hee was left vnpunished for the fault and offence which he had committed and perpetrated; and this was spoken by the said George Sharock to the said de Houtman, about the 20 of April 1623. when he was already absolued, released, freed, and out of all feare to be any more molested or questioned for the said fact and offence committed as aforesaid.

Thirdly, the said Gouverneur de Houtman being at Batavia and being present when John Beomont English Merchant, (who also was a confederate in the said conspiracy at Amboyna, and obtained his pardon) being sicke, was brought before the Gouverneur generall; and the said Beomont being come in the presence of the said Gouverneur generall, and of the said M^r. Houtman, confessed his fault before made and committed, and implored and most humbly desired mercy and pardon of the said Generall, which hauing obtained he humbly thanked them.

In the fourth place, That many people at Batavia, yea he the Deponent himselfe had by good information and knowledge certainly vnderstood that the said John Beomont being afterwards come before the English President and English Merchants resident at Batavia, hee the said Beomont recited and confessed the whole businesse and conspiracy: But when this pleased not the said English, the President of the English aforesaid for to obscure the cause, and to shunne the dishonour of the Treason, seeing the free confession of Beomont which much astonished them, he caused him for this cause to keepe close and not to speake to any body, because that the thing by the voluntary confession of the said Beomont against the intent of the English principalls, should not further be discovered and confirmed.

Fiftly, concerning the persons which were imployed as Judges in the cause of Amboyna in the matter of the condemned, and specially the Gouvernour van Speult (because he is best knowne,) they are such that there cannot be any the least suspicion or doubt of them, that they had wrongfully or without sufficient ground caused the English to be accused, or ill handled, or much lesse to bee put to death, if they had not beene found really in fault worthily to haue deserued the punishment: the Gouvernour van Speult being held for an honest man, of credit, and fearing God, by all those that haue conuerled with him: and by consequence, there may not bee admitted such a contrary suspicion of his impious and maligne proceedings.

In the sifst place, concerning the Torture of Water, which the Dutch haue alwayes vsed in the Indies, as the most assured and ciuill: which is not a torture so rough and dangerous as the tortures which are ordinarily vsed in this Country and throughout Europe, which are farre more seuerer and dangerous then that of Water; whereby the health of the person cannot any way be offended, nor the members lamed or bruised,

All which things aforesaid in representation and maintenance of the truth in this case, and which further might be in conformity of what is aforesaid, represented by the coming and arriving of many other persons out of the Indies, who also haue knowledge of that which passed at Amboyna: May it please your Honors to take into consideration, and to consider whether there bee not sufficient matter and cause giuen to the English East Indian Company for to leaue and remit the fault vnto them who were the authors and practisers of this abominable conspiracy, & of their owne misfortune, which they thus drew vpon themselves, and not to defend them, and aggravate against the Iudges of the Dutch: to which end the Directors in defence and maintenance of their Officers and vnblameable Ministers in the East Indies aforesaid, cannot omit to beseech your Honors that the cause may not bee precipitated, but that conuenient time might bee giuen and granted for a more exact research (if need bee) of the truth; yea in all to grant them such protection as all good Subjects and Patriots of the Vnited Prouinces are to attend from your Honors in equity and iustice. For how can this businesse be so inuerted, that in stead of the dishonour and blame which ought to dwell vpon the Confederates, on the contrary now they will blot and smother the truth of the thing, and to accuse and charge the Dutch Officers, as if they had had no honesty or conscience: which cannot bee presumed of substantiall people of good renoune vpon any either voluntary (though not true) or suborned and false deposition, of such as may not be admitted to testific in their owne cause, against the iudiciall Acts of a Colledge of Iudges, sworne, and in so great a number, which haue of a long time beene so imployed; when it appeareth not otherwise by any other legall proofes.

The intention of the Directors neuer was nor yet is to maintaine any iniustice, outrage, or imposture, if in these proceedings there were any vsed: but as long as it appeareth not clearly (as it ought in this case, against a Colledge, and against a cause iudged) nothing else, vnder reuerence, can be done in the businessse but to grant time for to make more exact and serious search (if need be,) and that by the authority and interuention of your Honours (as it shall appertaine) all misunderstandings, contrary Deductions, and ill expositions, griefes, and designs may cease and bee suppressed, vntill such time as the contrary may (if need be) appeare. The said Defences are such (in our opinion) as vnder reuerence this ought to be done. And although it were so, that the cause of the English against the Iudges of Amboyna seemed wholly to be cleare and proued, (which hitherto hath proued to the contrary) neuerthelessse the proceedings of the said Iudges may not in any wise be condemned (as touching the substance thereof) without hearing the Iudges themselues, whom the cause properly toucheth and concerneth, and not the Directors; who onely mediate, for as much as according to the information and knowledge which they haue of the cause it seemeth to them to be in effect iust and faire, and therefore the humble remonstrance or representation and prayer of the Administrators strators or Directors haue euer beene, that it would please your Honours to giue and grant conuenient time for the inquiry, information, and research of the businesse vntill such time as the ships of Batavia shall be arriued here; to the end that the matter may more plainly and truly bee discovered and knowne; and without doubt there will come and be transported therein from thence some that will neutrally and in such sort maintaine vnto your Honours the particular informations of the proceedings passed in Amboyna, that they may be wholly beleued and receiued: as at this present there is come and fallen out by the coming and returne of M. Frederick de Houman chiefe Councillor of the Indies and ancient Gouernour of the Isles of Molucques, who hath deposed and by oath testified the points in manner as they are recited and related in order as aboue; which bringeth not a little light in this cause, but may wholly tend and turne to the ouerthrow of all contrary expositions and calumnies, which heretofore haue beene vsed and set forth, with such differences and vehemency, whereby we hope that your Honors will in all points, and that with equity, right, and reason, giue and cause to be giuen such content, that all discontent (at least by prouision) may cease, vntill such time as the whole truth may more and abundantly come to light by aduice from the Indies, to the full satisfaction of those whom it toucheth or concerneth. For may it please your Honors to know and vnderstand that the best and most pertinent and true knowledge of the businesse must come from the Prouince of Amboyna to Batavia, and from thence hither. Notwithstanding so it is that since the departure of the Pinace called the Hare from Batavia, which was in the beginning of January 1624. (by which the first notice of the Execution was brought) vntill the departure of the last ships which also came from Batavia, there is not nor cannot haue come any newes from Amboyna to Batavia, concerning this businesse, because the winde called the Westerne Mouffons blow continually from November vntill Aprill. And for to come from Amboyna to Batavia an Easterne Mouffon is necessary; and that beginneth first in May: so that without that it is a thing impossible to send or to get any aduice or ships from Amboyna to Batavia.

We hope also that your Lordships will finde this reasonable, and that due and reasonable time required shall be granted and permitted in iustice for the more ample search and information of the cause (if need be) and we cannot coniecture (being a thing incredible) that any one will condemne any cause or persons without first hearing the iustification of the parties, which alwaies hath beene held and obserued inuiolably of all nations which would iudge according to right and equity. Therefore wee hope that it will be thus granted; yea it is not reasonable that any reparation should bee required, before the due defences and informations of the businesse be made and taken, and the same ought to be made and taken by and from the persons whom the cause concerneth, appertaineth, and is knowne, and who also pertinently know how to refute the obiections and circumstances alleadged and heretofore vrged to the contrary: which vnto vs is impossible to doe, not having been present: but only for the defence of our Officers, for so much as is iust and reasonable wee can alleadge that which they haue written vnto vs from the Indies, and what else we haue certainly perceiued and vnderstood.

Also we cannot in the meane time conceale from your Honours that the fact of this conspiracy is so notorious in the Indies, and that thence may bee drawne so strong and vigorous proofes, that the Truth shall fully and sufficiently appeare to the full discharge of the innocents, and the confusion of those which will defend and maintaine a bad cause; And this may bee proued there besides the points aboue alleadged.

First, that all the Iaponians, complices in the conspiracy haue signed each with their owne hands their confessions; and afterwards iointly and all together haue persisted therein after the end of the examination; without torture or fetters, at many sittings and full assemblies of the Councell at Amboyna, without reuoking any thing, or desiring to diminish or augment any thing from or to their said confessions.

In the second place, That the English complices at sundry times of their owne accord without paine, irons, tortures or menaces, ratified the same, and respectively signed their confessions: vpon which confessions they were afterwards againe examined three or foure times, and re-examined in a full Councell and Assembly; and after their examination haue persisted therein without reuoking or changing any thing.

Thirdly

Thirdly, that the Governour of Amboyna (after that all the complices had respectiuely foure or fīue times ratified their confessions and persisted therein a little before the execution, seriously remonstrated, exhorted, represented, and demanded, of the said complices (as before had done vnto them in particular) That in case any one of them had by apprehension of iustice, feare of menaces, or terrour of paine, said, confessed, and signed any thing, by which he was surprisid and made guilty, and whereby others might come and fall into danger or hazard, that hee should speake and manifest it openly that he might discharge the party thereof. For the Governour protested that he was not desirous of the destruction and death of any that was not guilty. Vpon which proposition euery one of them shrunke vp their shoulders and said, that what he had confessed and signed particularly was true, and therefore he persisted therein.

In the fourth place, One of the complices called William Webber, in his last examination confessed that he had recieued a Letter from John Clarke, by which hee was aduertised that something of great waight and consequence was handled amongst the English; but he could not vnderstand what it might be: the which letter containing as aforesaid, the said Clarke confessed also in the absence of Webber that he had written it.

Fīstly, that Edward Collins being examined and making his confession without any torment or torture (as appeareth by the Acts) offered to confesse all of his owne freewill: yea hee declared the same before before Gabriel Towerfon and all the other English, and that he did not thinke that the said Towerfon and all the rest which were there faulty would dare to deny it, but would presently confesse it, as also the said Towerfon being brought to Collins (and the said Collins falling vpon his knees and requiring mercie and pardon) he said, and told it him to his face, admonishing the said Towerfon that he would presently declare and confesse all as he had done, saying, I must speake and confesse the truth, and I meane not to suffer or endure any paine for the loue of you.

In the sixt place, That Emanuel Tompson two dayes after the examination finished and ended, and when he was free and at liberty, being inquired by the Commissioners which had assisted in the same examination, wherefore he had so long persisted in his denials and endured the seuerer examination, said, the reason was because Captaine Gabriel Towerfon had oftentimes reprehended his drunkennesse, saying, that hee should take good heed that thereby the matter should not be discovered; For which cause the said Tompson did by a great oath sweare to himselfe, that howsoeuer it went hee would not bee the third nor the fourth by whom the matter should be knowne, whatsoeuer paine (in his opinion) he could haue beene put vnto.

Seuenthly, the said Emanuel Tompson certaine daies after his examination being visited by certaine Commissioners said vnto them that hee was very glad that God had caused the busines to be brought to light, because much innocent blood would haue beene spilt, and although he confessed that hee

had deserued once, yea twice to dye, he asked mercy seeing that he was a man of about fiftie yeares, &c. And so after so much fauour was giuen to the said Tompson for to draw a lot with Coulson and Collins which of them three should be released and freed.

In the eight place, that two or three dayes before the execution, Captaine Towerson being in the Hall with other the conuiet English, said in the presence of the Governour and all the Councill, and to the rest of the English in generall by reproach, that their ill and disordinate liues, their whoredome and drunkenesse was the cause that it pleased God that they should not keepe secret the intended enterprise; and that by reason thereof they were now fallen and brought to such misery.

Ninthly, that Gabriel Towerson author of this conspiracy, in his last extremitie prayed the rest of his complices to pardon him, because that by him Towerson they were instigated and brought vnto the said enterprise, and were reduced to that case, and that the businesse was come to be discovered by the all-seeing God, and that he must of necessity dye, and therefore hauing brought them into this danger and ill chance he prayed them to pardon him, as they also did.

In the tenth place, The said Towerson a little before his death writ a Letter to Samuel Coulson, which letter is yet in the hands of the Governour of Amboyna Herman van Spelut, by which the said Towerson said and alleadged vnto the said Coulson, that he the said Coulson was the first and principall cause which had made the agreement and condescending vnto the act of

of inuading and making of themſelues maſters of the Caſtle, but notwithstanding at the preſent he pardoned him.

Eleuenthly, that the ſhip called the Vnicorne ſayling from Amboyna to Batavia, the two English Merchants Edward Collins and Iohn Beomont which were pardoned were transported therein, vnto the end to impetrate and obtaine their full pardon in Batavia aforeſaid, and they two English Merchants being requested by the officers of the ſhip to come ſit down and eate at the Table of the Commiſſioners, during the ſaid voyage; the ſaid Collins ſaid, excuſing of himſelfe, that they were not worthy to ſit by the ſaid Commiſſioners, becauſe that the ſaid English had had ſuch an ill purpoſe and deſign againſt the Dutch, and yet they were by them in that faſhion entertained, and were exempted of the puniſhment: and therefore they could very well eate apart: which excuſe notwithstanding was not receiued nor accepted by the Commiſſioners of the Dutch.

In the twelfth place are adioyned and annexed the report and depositions of the ſaid Gouernour de Houtman concerning the confeſſions of the ſaid two English Merchants made before the Gouernor himſelfe, and afterwards before the Preſident and principall English, and that which further may be declared at Batavia, whereof diuers perſons there haue notice.

In the thirteenth place, concerning the torture in the proceedings vſed at Amboyna, they can giue certaine prooſe of the truth it ſelfe, that many perſons mentioned in the English Writing to haue bin tortured with water and fire, haue not one beene once touched.

In the fourteenth place, concerning the particularities and petty points of the said Writing in English touching the examination of certaine persons therein mentioned for the discharge and innocency of the English, the same shall bee proued neuer to haue beene done nor heard, by depositions of those which haue beene present at all, and by persons before whom such things must needs haue beene spoken and declared.

In the fifteenth place, it shall also bee found that the pretended miracles were deuised onely for the discharge of the English, and in their fauour.

Y. These said points and many others which are yet further well knowne to the Directors, may be clearly and by good prooffe showne in time and place, if due and conuenient time be giuen and granted vnto the cause and re-search thereof: which in a matter so important and of such waight, comming also from so remote parts, cannot (vnder reuerence) be denied to any: So that your Honours may please to desire the same of his Maiesty of Great Britaine, without which the Directors can very ill propose any other meanes which would not be mingled either with iniustice, or the great preiudice and disadvantage of the Dutch Company.

We also surely hope that his said Maiesty according to his great wisdom and iustice cannot refuse or deny the said respite for the examination of the businesse more exactly and particularly; which wee be-

beseech your Honours in all reuerence to interpose and mediate, and by all meanes to effect and obtaine; that (as reason requireth) neither the Company in generall, nor the Masters in particular may not during this interim be any way grieued or preiudiced in their iust defences. Which doing, &c.

REPLY TO THE REMONSTRANCE
 of the Bewinthebbers or Directors
 of the Netherlands East-India Companie
 lately exhibited to the Lords States Generall, in iustification of the proceedings of their Officers at AMBOYNA, against the English there.

The Directors of the Netherlands East-India Company, finding it needful to defend their Officers at Ambeynaby
 this Remonstrance, referre themselves in the first place vnto a former deduction which they had exhibited vnto the Lords States in Iuly

u.

last: Wherein they professe still to insist. And considering (say they) the infallible Indicia that preceded the discouerie of this conspiracy, and the iust and Legall proceedings vsed against the Complices, appearing by the inditiall acts signed aswell by the parties examined, as by the Gouernor and Councell of Amboyna, who are a Colledge or Court of Iudges admitted and sworne; against which no prooffe, much lesse any vaine and frivulous suspicions ought to be admitted, they therefore conceived (vntill they see the contrary) that the Conspirators (as they call them) were lawfully, and rightly apprehended, the fact well prooued, according to the Law and Custome of the Low-Countries, and consequently that the punishment was lawfully inflicted, with moderation of the rigour of Iustice and with clemency.

This deduction of the moneth of July heere mentioned, hath not beene yet imparted to the English East-India Companie. Otherwise they would haue examined the same, as they did the Relation printed in the Scheme of a letter Missive. Which yet they verily beleue to be the verie same in effect, and compiled by the same pen; for that it appeareth by comparing of the printed Pamphlet, with the Acts of this Proesse at Amboyna, here mentioned (copie whereof was communicated to the said English Companie) that the body of the said Pamphlet, (the preamble excepted) was wholie taken out of the same acts; onely with some sophistication, of the act touching Master Towersons pretended voluntarie confession, noted in the Answer to the same Pamphlet. Wherefore although it may be supposed that this deduction here referred vnto, is already sufficiently answered in the said answer to the Dutch Relation; yet because in this very recitall of the Directors, there are certaine generall heads, either recapitulated out of that deduction, duction, or laid for new grounds of the justification of the Dutch proceedings; it will not be amisse to examine them as they lie.

And first for the infallible Indicia pretended to haue preceeded the discouery; it is shewed in the answer to the Pamphlet, that the Indicia to torture the first Japon (which was the beginning of the whole Proccesse) were insufficient in law: the behaiour that this Japon vsed, and vpon which he was apprehended, being none other, then that which is and may be vsed by any Souldier in the place where he serueth, without blame or suspicion. For other Indicia, there was not the least; neither of prouisions of the English for such an employte, nor of Letters to or from any Complice, nor of suspicious conferences, messages, or intelligencies, nor of flight or close keeping of the parties; nor any other agreeing with the rules or examples ginen by the Law, or the Authors commenting thereupon. But being destitute of these and the like lawfull Indicia, the Dutch Officers were faine to fetch their Indicia out of the Racke, and to make the confession of one tortured person Inaicium to torture another, contrary to the very expresse direction of the Law. Some confessions indeed, were without actuall torture of the persons themselves: but euen such had heard the cryes and seene the bodies of others tortured and martyred before them; which feare of the Torture is by the Law equallled to the torture it selfe, as hath beene shewed in the said answer.

The second generall ground here layd, is the iudiciall acts of the Colledge of Iudges at Amboyna, shewing their just and legall proceedings. The Acts indeed of any Court of Iustice being orderly kept, yeeld a very sufficient prooffe in the point of fact in Court: that is, they prooue that such and such examinations, confessions, proofes, and evidences were taken and made; and such iudgement thereupon giuen as is therein entred. But for the point of Iustice, that must be judged by the comparing of the proofes with the sentence grounded vpon them. Now as touching the orderly keeping of these Acts imparted to the English East India Company as aforesaid: the same are neither agreeable to the formes of other Courts, nor vniforme in themselves. For the point of conformitie to other Courts, it is not here meant to require, that the Acts of the Councill of Amboyna should in euery point agree with the formes of euery Court in the Low Countryes; the seuerall Courts whereof haue their seuerall formes and stile, and some differences in points not substantiall. But some generall Requisites of forme there be, which are obserued in all Courts; yet omitted in these Acts of Amboyna. As first the date of euery dayes passages ought to be prefixed or annexed vnto them; which is not obserued in these said Acts. But in these Acts the examination of all the English, being 18 seuerall prisoners, goeth vnder the date of the 25. of Februarie: although the confessions are so many and so large, as could not possibly be taken in one day: yea three of the same prisoners, to wit, Powle, Wetherall, and Ladbroke were but apprehended first vpon the 26. of February, and that at Cambello the outmost factory in Seran, and arriued not at Amboyna (where these examinations were taken) vntill the second of March stilo nouo. So that they could not be examined at Amboyna the 25. of February.

February as the Acts import. Next, it is a solemnitie in all Courts, to note in the Acts, the day of the examination of the Prisoner vpon the Torture, or in the place of the Torture; and then the act of his subscription to his confession vpon another day. For these two may not be done vpon the same day by the Law: but the confession must be iterated and confirmed by the Prisoner being free of bonds and irons, at least a day after the sence or sight of the torture: els it is not held for good, and concluding against the partie that confessed it. But in all these Acts of Amboyna, there is but one date and one Act for both these: contrary to the Law it selfe, and the Custome and forme of all Courts. Thirdly, the Acts ought to specifie whether the Prisoner confesseth vpon Torture or without. But these Acts doe not so: but onely in the generall; in the beginning of the Acts of the 26. of February, it is entred, that some confessed before Torture, others with little Torture as followeth, &c. Whereby it appeareth not, who was tortured and who not; nor what was confessed with, and what without torture. Fourthly, the Acts ought to specifie what finally becometh of every prisoner; but in these Acts there is no entry made what became of Sherrocke, Webber, and two of the Iapons, to wit, Soyfimo and Sacoube; these being by the Acts neither condemned, nor absolved, nor reprimed; and yet all foure are de facto dismissed and set at libertie.

As for the point of Vniformitie in the Acts themselves, Collins and Beamount are disposed of by speciall Act; yet Sherrock, Webber, and the two Iapons (all in the same case) are discharged, as before, without any Act for it. Yea there is an Act entred for disposing of the Portugalls wife, though shee were neither accused nor examined: as if shee had beene a partie to the Proceffe, rather then Sherrock, Webber, and these two Japons, against all whom the Fiscall craued judgment. Further, some of the Examinations haue the Gouvernour and his Councels names subscribed to them, and some not: some of the confessions haue the prisoners names subscribed and some not; with diuers other defects and disconformities, which easily and plainly discouer that they are not allowable for orderly and authentickall Acts of a Court of Iustice.

Thus hath beene shewed what credit may be giuen to these Acts in the point of fact therein recorded. Now for the point of Iustice, appearing by comparing the proofes against the prisoners with the sentence, it is in the first place to be noted, that there is no prooffe nor euidence of any thing entred in all the said Acts, no not so much as a witnesse named, much lesse deposed, of the least Indicium against the prisoners, or any of them; but onely the meere confessions of the prisoners themselues, drawne from them by the paine or just feare of torture. Which meere cōfession of the parties, without other Indiciū or proof, is no sufficient ground to condemne any by the Law of the Low Countries.

Secondly, it is a Requisite of their Law, that the prisoners subscribe their confessions being free of bonds and irons. Now neither is there any mention in all the Acts of any such free confession; and all our people that escaped are ready to confirme vpon their oathes, that from the first apprehension vntill the houre of going to the execution, there was no intermission of the fetters.

Thirdly, the same confessions are full of contrarieties: as one while that the plott should be executed when some English ship or shippes should be there arrived, the people whereof should assist in the explot: another while, that when the Castle was taken, then Maister *Tower*son would first send to Iaccatra for assistance. Likewise, one while that it should be attempted when the Dutch Gouvernor was abroad vpon some enterprize: another while that the Gouvernor himselfe should be killed in the Castle. Further, one while that all the Iapons were wonne to the plotte before Maister *Tower*son opened it to the English, and consulted with them; another while, that he sent out some of the English eight dayes after that consultation, then to winne the Iapons. Also one while that the Iapons had consulted diuers times with Maister *Tower*son himselfe in the English house; another while that they neuer treated with Maister *Tower*son himselfe, but with others in his name; with other like contradictions, differences, and incertainties. Further, the place, persons and time were specified to Abel Price in his examination, contrary to the Law. In the last place the thing confessed to be plotted, was not onely impossible to be atchieued by such meanes and manner of execution as was confessed: but as impossible also to come into the imagination of any man in his witts: as is already sufficiently shewed in the answer to the Dutch Relation. By which premises appeareth, that as well through defect of other prooffe, besides the meere confessions of the prisoners, and that in Irons; as in respect of the incertaintie, inconsistency, and contrariety of the same confessions, the specification and leading examinations, together with

with the impossibilitie of the truth of the thing confessed, there is in these Acts no lawful ground for the sentence of condemnation.

The third generall ground that is laid in this Remonstrance is, that the Acts were signed by the prisoners themselves, and by the Councell of Amboyna, which is a Court or Colledge of Iudges admitted and sworne: and therefore no proofes, much lesse any vaine and friuolous suspicions may be admitted to the contrary..

As for the subscription of the Prisoners to their confessions; of what value that is without other Indicia and proofes hath beene already declared. Now that no proofes may be admitted against sworne Iudges, is a strange Maxime: which being granted must needs inferre either that such Iudges cannot erre and judge vniustly; or else that how euer they carry themselves, their doings must not be examined, much lesse punished. So that then the Law hath in vaine prouided punishment for a Iudge in case of wrong imprisonment, causelesse vnorderly torture, and of vniust absolving or condemning, and the like; for which there are so many and so diligent prouisions. It may be thought indeed, that vnder this confidence this whole Proesse was begun and followed; as the safest and fairest way to be ridd of the English, without such reckoning as was formerly made for the courses of open hostilitie. But if this way goe for currant, though towards a forraigne Nation: how comes it that by the Law and custome of Nations, so many Reprizalles and warres haue been made for iniustice done by the Iudges of one Nation to the people of another, when none other redresse could be obtained; yea and many times in such

foule causes as this, without any demand of redresse?

These grounds aforeſaid, being thus laid, this Remonſtrance proceedeth to take notice of two ſeueral Diſcourſes ſpread as well in England as in the Low Countries againſt the Dutch cauſe of Amboyna: the firſt, a briefe Collection of the effect of certaine Letters written by the English Factors at Iaccatra, dated the 19. of June 1623. The ſecond, a more ample Writing, entituled, A true Relation of the cruell and barbarous Tortures and Execution of the English at Amboyna by the Dutch there. The former of theſe this Remonſtrance chargeth with paſſion and great vehemency; becauſe it doth by way of preiudice, enſtile the Proceſſe of Amboyna, an vniuſt and barbarous murder: and aggrauateth the faſhion and manner of the Tortures. So it vouchſafeth this none other anſwere; but this note of paſſion; and that it falſely nameth the Japons executed to be the ſeruants of the English; Whereas in truth they were the ſeruants of the Dutch at Amboyna. What or whoſe this Diſcourſe thus excepted againſt and thus anſwered is; the English Company knowes not. Yet they belecue not that any of the English partie, would (except it were by a ſlip of the penne) call theſe Japons, ſeruants of the English: the ſame being contrary to all the reports and aduertifements that came from Amboyna and Iaccatra; it is likewise to be preſumed, that if in that Writing there had beene any thing els, which they could haue anſwered, they would not haue diſmiſſed it as they doe. For, as for the terming the execution, An vniuſt and barbarous murder; that were no more cauſe to reiect the Diſcourſe without further anſwere; then the like ſtile giuen it in the very

title of the second and larger Writing, which neuerthelesse hath obtained a more particular answer.

- C. Hauing giuen the first Writing this quicke dispatch, the Remonstrance proceedeth to the answer of the Relation set out by the English East India Company; and in the first place chargeth it with an impertinent description (in the very introduction) of the Castle of Amboyna, and the Dutch Garrisons and Forces there; to the end (saith this Remonstrance) to shew that there was no likelihood nor probability that the English there would vndertake the surprize of the Castle; being a thing impossible to be done: as if (saith the Remonstrance) the want of vnderstanding in the Conspirators, and the foolish ground of their proiect (all other accusations ceasing) should haue excused them from punishment: the contrary whereof is euery where obserued.

Here in the very first steppe of the Answer, the end of the English Company in setting out the impossibilitie of the fact, is either mistaken or traduced. For if the conspiracy had beene sufficiently prooued according to the direction euen of the Lawes by which the Dutch are gouerned; then the probabilitie or possibilitie of the fact had neuer beene alledged. For in such case it is true, that the foolishnesse of the plott excuseth no man. But when there is no other prooffe or euidence, but the meere confession of the prisoner, (which is the present case) then the very text of the Law of treason, enioyneth the Iudge to consider the person of the prisoner (which is the present case) then the very text of the Law of Treason, enioyneth the Iudge to consider the person of the prisoner; whether he be able to execute such a thing as he is accused of, whether he euer practised the like before; what he meant; and whether he were in his wits or no; and such like; For without these considerations the slippery confession of the tongue ought not to be the ground of the punishment. This is their Law, according to which if they had proceeded, the English had neuer needed to alledge these impossibilities; which the Iudges themselues ought to haue considered. But not hauing done it, they haue made themselues guiltie of vniust Iudgement; which to prooue, the impossibilitie of the fact is both pertinent and necessary.

But the better to inforce the former answer, the Remonstrance saith, that this presumption of the impossibilitie of the fact ought not to be considered, against a veritie altogether notorious and prooued, against the confessions of the prisoners themselues, and against the conscience & testimony of so many men of worth and credit, that managed this affayre, and against a Court or Colledge of Iudges, &c. in publique Office and sworne.

All this is but a Rhetoricall flourish, and being examined, will vanish into the ayre as a meere sound. For first for the notoriousnesse of the pretended conspiracie; although now ex post facto, they cry it out for notorious; yet at the time when the notoriety should haue beene considered, which was before the apprehension, torturing, and execution of our people; there was not the least breath of such a fame. It is now too late to alledge a notoriety, that themselues haue made who alledge it. As for the proofes here mentioned; Why haue they not at any time specified them? If there be none other proofes besides the meere confessions (as other the Acts doe not so much as mention) why then are proofes and confessions here distinctly acumulated; as if there were any other proofes besides the said confessions? As for the conscience and testimony of those that managed the Proceffe, being a publique and sworne Colledge of Iudges; it is not at all to be reckoned of; when it appeareth that they haue not proceeded according to the Law. And if this plea might be admitted, no Iudge should euer be found guiltie of Iniustice. Further, if the very qualitie of the Iudges be considered, it will rather hurt then helpe them: there were none amongst them that had any ordinary knowledge in the Law, whereby they vnder-take to iudge causes: besides their young yeares and wicked liues: which if it were pertinent to the cause in question, might be set forth by many speciall instances. But if they were neuer so learned, experienced, or well famed; yet that would not auayle when they haue proceeded against the prescript of their owne Law (to say nothing here of the treatie) as they are sufficiently prooued to haue done.

But this Remonstrance not trusting to this Answer, in slighting the improbability and impossibility of the fact, as not worth the considering; yet for all that, in the next place labourerth and sweateth to make the fact seeme probable and possible, the contrary whereof in vs that hold the contrary part, it reiecteth as impertinent; Is it impertinent for vs to shew the improbabilitie and impossibilitie of the fact; and yet pertinent for them to shew the contrary probabilitie and possibilitie? But let vs see and consider their presumptions.

E. First (they say) they haue already proued, that the Engl

English for a diversion of the Dutch Forces in the Castle, had invited and induced all the Ternatans, Seranians, and neighbouring Indians to rebell, and doe violence to the Dutch, that when the Dutch Governour should have drawne the maine of his Forces of men and shipping that way, then the English might with ease take the Castle so emptied and denuded of her Forces.

How vaine this point is, is already manifested in the Answer to the Dutch Relation. And as for the proofes here mentioned; there is in all the Acts not so much as any offer made of any prooffe of this point.

But it is worthy againe to be noted, that here the device and Scene is changed. For where in the Dutch Relation it is said, (though no where prooved) that the Ternatans of Lobo should have come with their Curricurries to assist Maister Towerson at Amboyna, and that the Dutch Governour must have beene killed there in the Castle by the Japons; now he must be gone with all his Forces out of the Island to tame those Ternatans and the rest of the Seranians & neighbouring Indians: that the English might surprize the Castle in their absence. As for the shippes of the Dutch, which now also must have beene absent: it is well knowne, that the service here pretended would neither need, nor could have use of their great shippes, but onely of Curricurries and small Vessels, which also the Dutch after used, leaving their great shipping in the roade by the Castle.

The strength of the Dutch thus extenuated, in the next place the Remonstrance pursuing the argument of possibilitie, amplifieth the Forces of the English. And first it deliviereth, that the English had a great number of slaues in their Factories, which great number is already truely confessed in the answer to the Dutch Relation, to be iust fixe and all boyes. Next it is added, that they would also haue stayed their actuall attempt of the Castle, vntill some English shippes were arriued there; which point is also at large refuted in the said Answer. Thirdly, here is alledged, that Maister Tower-son had giuen charge vnto his other English, to haue daily laboured and wonne by vnder-hand practize, o-ther subiects of the Dutch, thereby to augment their owne partie, and to weaken the strength of the Dutch. Of which point, as there was no probabilitie; so in all the Acts, there is no shadow of prooffe thereof made, or so much as endeuoured: how euer now the desperate cause requireth the helpe of so grosse a fiction. Fourthly (which is vaunted for the principall argumēt) it is here seriously obserued; that the Castle should haue bene surprized by treason and not by siege; and so like enough the English (though but few) might by this meanes doe wonders. A very poore note; as if the English Relation had cited impossibilities by way of siege, and not as well by way of trechery. But besides that, this argument beggeth the maine question; to wit, that there was indeed such a treason: was there euer any such treason or stratagem practized in any Countrey, to surprize a Castle by a small force; without a competency of seconds to make good and hold that which was so entred and possessed? Yet this argument is further enforced, not onely by the opportunitie that the Japons had to betray the Castle; themselues seruing as Souldiers therein; but also by the extraordinary valour and hardinesse of that Nation, set forth by two severall

Apochriphal Legends of strange feats of other Japons; without specifying of the number of them that performed these wonders, but leauing a blanke to helpe the tale at their pleasure. But let it be granted that the Japons are all Gyants, and had opportunity being trusted: yet is it likely, that the Dutch Governour in his expedition here supposed against the Rebels of Seran and the other Indians, would haue left such Worthies idle in their Castle at home, and not haue taken them with them, according to their Custome? Would they haue withdrawne their Dutch, and trusted such strangers with their Castle, being yet so suspitious of them, that they would torture them for asking an ordinary harmeless question? O miserable presumptions! And yet here we haue all the particulars that are alledged, or could be inuented.

In the next place, the Remonstrants returne to the answere of the English Relation: finding themselves grieved, that their Councell of Amboyna is charged to haue forged this crime against the English, thereby to be ridd of their company, and so to enioy the trade there alone. For their purgation wherein, here are diuers arguments alledged. As first, that if they had not liked their company there, it had beene easier and fairer to haue kept them out, when they were out, then to haue so cast them out after their admission of them by the Treatie, Ann. 1619. And God forbid (saith the Remonstrance,) that any should vse such wicked and bloody meanes for so poore an end, as onely to driue the English out of Amboyna.

It is true ordinarily; Turpius eicitur &c. It is more discourtesie to turne out a guest, then at first to deny him him entertainment. But sometimes there may be such a necessitie, as that a man must needs, for avoyding of a greater inconuenience, entertaine the guest, whom he is as glad to be ridd of, as he was vnwilling to receiue him. And sometimes a man entertaineth a guest in hope of some benefit to be made by him; whereof afterwards being frustrate, he will gladly be quit of his guest as soone as he findeth himselfe defeated of his hoped ends. Both these considerations haue had their place in this entertaining of the English by the Dutch at Amboyna and other places. For the former, all that are acquainted with the occasion, and the passages of the Treatie of the year 1619. know very well, that there was then none other or better way or meane for the Hollanders East India Company to giue satisfaction to the Kings Maiesty for the bloud of many of his people, and the inualuable damage done vnto the English Company by the said Hollanders vniust taking of their shippes and goods onely in respect of their lawfull trade into the Islands of the Moluccoes and Banda; but the accommodation of the whole matter, by admitting of the English East India Company into the participation of the trade in those Islands, and this of Amboyna. Which being yeelded vnto with great difficultie; yet the said Dutch with might and maine referued the Forts which they were then possessed of, in their owne hands: thereby still retaining the power and opportunitie to master the English, and weary them of their lodging at their pleasure. In the next place, it seemeth by their after-course that hauing so assured themselves of the Forts and Mastring power, they hoped to make benefit by this partnership; by the ordering ring of their Accompts in such manner, as that the English should pay their part of the charge as well of the Garrisons as of their new buildings, and of the warres which they vnderooke for enlarging the Dutches Dominion, and all this in ready money, whilest the Dutch furnished their owne share in commodities, and at what prizes they list. Now when the Dutch in the Indies saw, that the English there would not suffer themselues to be thus bridled and fadled; but made their protests and complaints against this dealing, they sought meanes to be quit of them. And finding that the blunt way of fact would not be well taken, but giue a new offence to the King, (especially after the Treaty to the contrary) they deuise this new meane to thrust out their vnwelcome guests, with lesse bloodshed then they before had kept them out with, and with lesse feare of accompting for the same, being done vnder the faire colour of Iustice; which point being clearly enough touched in the very Introduction of the English Relation, this Remonstrance professing an answer to the whole, yet passeth ouer this with a dry foote, and deepe silence: yea, it minceth the very matter whereof it seemes to take notice, making the charge against them to be onely the driuing of the English out of Amboyna, where the English Relation chargeth them to haue contriued and executed this bloody businesse, with intention to driue them (the English) out of the Moluccoes and Banda also, as well as out of Amboyna. Which end and drift of the worke how euer it is slighted here by the Remonstrants, yet it appeareth of what value it is in their secret estimation, by that which they haue formerly done to keepe the English from the trade of those Islands.

1. Yet further to cleare themselves of this end and designe, they alledge that the Netherlands East India Company here in Europe neuer gaue any Commission to their Officers at Amboyna, to put such a thing as this in practise, nor could haue any benefit thereby, but rather losse: and the Officers themselves were too honest and wise to haue executed such a Commission: especially since themselves should haue no profit by it, but incurre great danger of giuing accompt for the same.

For the point of Commission, the English Company doth not charge the Dutch Company, nor the whole Colledge of Directors, with any such proiect or direction. Neither doe they thinke that any one amongst them would by his priuate aduice incite the Governour of Amboyna to this or the like fact in particular. But they cannot tell whether some one or few amongst them of speciall place and authoritie; and of like respect with their Officers in the Indies, may not vpon some discontent or dislike of the Treatie & the effects thereof, haue giuen aduice to the principall Officers of the Dutch in the Indies, to lay hands and make vse of any colourable occasion, to weary the English of the trade established by the Treatie; and so the Governour of Amboyna may haue fallen vpon this particular out of such generall grounds of aduice. Which suspicion of the English Company, ariseth not onely from the earnest and strayned defence and iustification which they now obserue to be made of this execrable fact; but also from a passage that fell out here in London immediately after the Treatie An. 1619. which now this dispute calleth to their remembrance. And here in they report themselves selues to the memorie and conscience of those of the Dutch directors, that were then employed in the forming of an explanation of the Articles of the Treatie, intituled; The Order of Execution, &c. whether one of them appearing highly discontented, for that the English would not condescend to a proposition of theirs, about the order of selling out the Spices here in Europe, did not then in a vehement manner threaten the English (that dealt with them about that point) that they should repent them of their dissent herein: which the English not vnderstanding by all the disputes, how it could come to passe in the course of trade, if the treatie were obserued, still persisted in their former resolution. Whereupon the said partie with the rest of the Dutch desired that it might be noted in the Journall of the Conference; that they had forewarned them, that there would a great inconuenience follow by reason of this dissent of the English, which was noted in the same Journall accordingly. What this carriage might portend, or what directiōs might be giuen in consequence of this discontent, the English Company leaue to be iudged by others: hauing themselues neuer since in the course of their sale of the Spices, without obseruation of the order (then desired by the Dutch) found any inconuenience but rather aduantage; As for the benefit of the Dutch by driuing the English from the trade of the Moluccoes, Banda, and Amboyna, it may be esteemed (as is before noted) by the courses that the Dutch formerly tooke to keepe the English out of that trade. And for their contrary benefit here also pretended by holding the English in the communion of that trade: It is true, that as long as the English would pay readie money, the Dutch paying in wares, would beare their share of the charge of Fortifications and Conquests, whereof the benefit accrued wholly to the Dutch, as long as they would ioyne with the Dutch to finde the Enemy worke in one place, while the Dutch might thereby the easier winne for themselues onely in another place: so long the Dutch might easily make benefit of their partnership, and abide their sharing with them for one third part of that trade. But when the English shewed themselues sensible of this Leonine Societie, and protested against it, and refused to pursue the Action of defence in such a course: Then it was time to seeke out an occasion to be vtterly freed from their partnership, now proouing otherwise then was before hoped. As touching the honestie of their Officers at Amboyna here alledged, there hath been enough said already. And for their benefit also by thus ridding themselues of the English, who knoweth not what benefit may be expected by being an Instrument of so great profit, atchieuing it by such a conueyance, wherein who euer giueth Commission, is by ioynt guilt obliged to gratifie and promote his instrument euen for his owne safetie? Besides, their Officers had their owne priuate quarrells against the English for their daily complaints against their riotous liuing, and the great expence thereof, deriued in the greatest part vpon the English by the arts aboue-mentioned. Especially the Governour himselfe had a maine grieffe, that the English had often complained to the Councell of Defence at Iaccatra, of the extraordinary & excessiue charge of his Table and other expences: which by the Iournal of the consultations of the said Councell appeareth to haue bin

a matter of much dispute there, and was at last promised by the Dutch partie to be reformed. Another quarrell also the same Governour had against the English at Amboyna, about a Dutch-man that was executed for killing of an Englishman; Which Dutch-man when the Governour could not fairely saue (the fact being too foule and manifest to beare it) he was so offended with the English prosecution of the matter, that he solemnly vowed, if euer any of the English came within his compasse, such should repent that none of them had interceded for the life of the said Dutch-man. Lastly, it must be remembred, that at the time of this forged crime, the newes of the Match with Spaine was very rife and hott at Amboyna; wherewith how all the Dutch there were enraged, and what insolent speeches they vsed of the Kings Maiestie, is well enough knowne; though thought vnmeet to be here recited.

Having thus laboured to cleare the finall cause of this Proesse, the Remonstrants returne to charge the English (that are executed) with other arguments of their pretended treason. As (say they) if it were not a true treason, why came the Japon (that was first apprehended vpon the walles) and made such curious inquisition about the setting of the Watch, and of the Dutch Forces in the Castle? How came it that being examined, he forthwith spake so pertinently of this treason? If he were suborned by the Dutch, why then did they execute him? Why did he accuse his owne Countrymen as well as the English? Why should the Dutch thus vse the Japons, whom they had no cause otherwise to hate?

K.

The first of these questions is already answered before, to wit, that the Japon did nothing herein, but what any Souldier may lawfully, and is wont to doe, without blame or iust suspicion. It importeth euery Souldier to know the strength of the place where he serueth, and the order and course of the seruice, as is said in the answer to the Dutch Relation. The second question would be as easily answered, if it had seemed good to those that kept the Acts, to haue kept faithfull Record in them of the Interrogatories ministred to this Japon in his tortures. But the English Relation in the Examinations of Collins, Sherrock, and Beamont, hath discovered the Art vsed in all the rest; to wit, the leading Interrogatories, or rather Directories, specifying to the prisoner what he might say to come quitt of the torture: As for the suborning of this Japon by the Dutch here mentioned in the third question; The English easily grant that hee was not suborned, but (which is worse) he was tortured to make him accuse both the English and his owne Countrymen) the Japons; which also answereth the fourth question of this Rhetoricall Dialogisme. And for the fift and last question, why the Dutch should also practise the Japons destruction: it is easily conceiued, that els the English should haue seemed to haue had no Complices, nor hope of assistance of other Nations, which would haue made their crime appeare more impossible to be a true charge then now it doth; although (as now it is) it is vtterly voyde of all probabilitie and possibilitie. And is it any wonder they would sacrifice the bloud of tenne Infidells for that end, for which they spared not tenne Christians, and those of that Nation which most a-

greeth with themselves in Religion, and to whom they are of all other Nations most beholden?

In the next place, the Remonstrance proceedeth to answer a circumstance related by the English, that the Japons being examined three or foure dayes before them, they yet fled not: whereby they shewed their innocency. To the consequence of which argument the Remonstrance first answereth, that the English did this to auoyde great suspition, being sure enough they could not fly: the Governour had (euen to their knowledge) taken such order to stop all passages, as well of all other Merchants that then frequented Amboyna as of the English.

This is a meere fiction: for the Curricurries and other Vessells departed as freely from Amboyna while the Japons were in examination, as at any time before. And if the Governour had vsed neuer so much circumspection herein, and the English had knowne of it, yet how could so many guiltie consciences haue contained themselves, and not one of them all haue attempted to flie or hide or disguise himselfe in all this time? All men know that a guiltie conscience prouoketh men to attempt escapes aboue and against all reason. And therefore the Law euer enquireth of the flight or shrinking of the accused as a speciall indicium of their guilt. Why did not the Dutch then in their examinations question and sift out by what consultation and agreement all the English came to be of one minde, to shew such confidence in this case?

But to make a further and better answer to this argument, the Remonstrance chargeth the matter of it with vntruth: Saying that the examination of the Japons

Japons

Japons began the 24. of Februarie, and that the next day after, to wit, the 25. the English were seized; So that here was but one dayes respite for the English to shift for themselves.

M. This impudence is very strange; for, the Acts of the Proceſſe record, the beginning of the examination of the Japons to be the 23. of Februarie, and the resolution to ſeize the English to be the 26. which is the third day after incluſive. It is well wee haue a copie of their Acts, (ſuch as they are) els we ſee into how many formes this Proteus would turne, to auoyde the true diſcovery.

N. After this the Remonſtrants with the like modeſtie note another vnruth in the English Relation, where it affirmeth that the English had not any conuerſation with the Japons; the contrary whereof (ſay the Remonſtrants) appeareth as well by the confeſſions of the English as the Japons, and particularly by Maſter Towerſons voluntary confeſſion, made long time after his examination.

What credit the Acts and confeſſions may deſerue, is alreadie ſhewed: and the very perſons themſelues therein aſſigned to this conuerſation with the Japons, had no language to ſerue them therein. And for Maſter Towerſons voluntary confeſſion pretended to be made ſo many dayes after his examination; beſides the foule play of the Dutch uſed in alledging it ſo, alreadie diſcovered in the answer of the Dutch Relation (which by this very touch appeareth to be the worke of the ſame Penne that wrote this Remonſtrance) that pretended voluntary confeſſion hath not one word or mention of the Japons in it: And yet this Remonſtrance (hauing thus stoutly prooued this point) triumpheth ouer the English Relation; saying, that these contrarieties and dissimulations shew that the same marueylously strayeth and wandreth from the truth; and that the contrary thereof in all points may be taken for true.

After this, the Remonstrance commeth to the examination of the English prisoners, set downe in our Relation: and promiseth that the particulars thereof shall hereafter in time be refuted, and prooued vtterly counterfeit in the most and most substantiall points: as shall likewise that which is there related of the tortures. But why haue they not all this while made, or at least attempted some disproofe hereof? Why could not Maerschalcke (whom they haue now deposed in other points) haue said something to these; being himselfe the second person in the Councell, and acquainted with all that passed? Well, since they be prooued here by sixe Witnesses, let them yet stand for true, vntill this promised Counterproofe arriue. O.

But for the point of torture, the Remonstrance answereth in the Interim, that if the case lawfully require, it is no fault in the Iudge to examine vpon the torture: being the Custome in all Europe, and particularly in the Low Countryes. And if any were tortured, that was done vpon pregnant and waightie Indicia, proofes and confessions of others.

This hath beene sufficiently replied to in the English Answer to the Dutch Relation, where it is prooued, first that the English were not lawfully subiect to the iurisdiction of the Governour of Amboyna, and therefore vnlawfully tortured. Secondly, that the kinde of torture used, was not agreeable to the Law and Custome of the Low Countryes: and lastly, that there was no sufficient Indicium for the torturing of the first Iapon, nor none other proofes or Indicia against the English, but the forced confessions of the tortured Iapons; which ground of torture is prohibited by their owne Law.

P. Yet further the Remonstrants fetch an argument out of this point of the tortures, in iustification of their officers fact at Amboyna. If (say they) they would haue drawne confessions out of the English by tortures; why did not they torture all the English?

This riddle is plainly vnfolded by the same English Relation: where it appeareth, that after they had tortured, Johnson, Collins, and Clarke; glad was that Englishman that could deuise any thing to confesse, to please the Fiscall, and auoyde the torture. Yea, Sherrock prayed to God to assist him in this kinde. Others asked those that had beene formerly examined, what they had confessed; saying, they would doe the like, thereby to shunne the crueltie of the torture. As for those that were acquitted (as hauing confessed nothing) the Dutch plot could not reach them. For hauing laide the consultation of this pretended conspiracie at Amboyna, where none of these foure were vpon New-yeares day; they had no colour to torture them, whom their owne people that stood by, knew to be so farre absent: And no man imagineth that all the Dutch that were by at the torture, were priuie to the intention of the Gouernour; who in this case was to carry himselfe so, as that he must not make the busines so grosse, that all that stood by might vnderstand it. It sufficed him that he caught the chiefe of the English there, there, and such a number by whose example all would afterwards abandon the fatall places.

Lastly, the Remonstrance gathereth that there was no excesse vsed, because some of the English were pardoned; to none other end (forsooth) but to giue testimony of their whole proceedings. Q.

This indeed is a point wherein the Dutch vsed the quintessence of their skill: so to handle the matter as that they would seeme to mixe clemency with Iustice; to make their Processe to passe the easier and fayrer, both among their owne people there, and after when it should come into Europe. But he that will but a little consider what the Dutch Governours end and ayme was, will finde, that as he and the Fiscall laboured in all the Processe to reach Captaine Towersson the chiefe of the English there; neuer satisfying themselves with any confession that made not him guiltie (as appeareth in the English Relation:) so when they had caught him, and so many other of the chiefe of the English there, it was a small matter for them to spare a few of the meaner sort: being assured that the execution of the rest, would be a sufficient warning for all other Englishmen euer after to keepe their distance farre enough from that place. And this tooke so right (according to the intention) that all the English as well at the Moluccoes and Banda, as the poore remnant at Amboyna forthwith vpon the newes of this Tragedy, quitted their Factories in all those Islands: choosing rather to leaue the places and their trade there, then their lines for it. For the Dutch had spoken loude enough, and plaine enough in this action, for all the English to vnderstand their meaning: who therefore would not stay till the chiefe of them also were thus cut off, and the rest dismissed with their life for a prey, and for an argument of the Dutch Officers clemencie. But if these few English were saued to this end, in the Dutches intention, to giue testimony of all their proceedings, as here is alledged: Why then doe not the Dutch receiue and allow of their testimony? For these all with one mouth accuse the Dutch to haue proceeded by trechery and most execrable iniustice in this whole action: although indeed some of them that were absolved, confesse vpon oath, that they conceiue the reason and end of the Dutch in sparing them, to haue beene in hope that for that fauour they would haue giuen testimony on their part, when this businesse should come to be examined here in Europe: if yet the cause should euer come to be reuiued here; for some of the Dutch at Amboyna declared plainly, that they made accompt the Spanissh Match would preuent the accompting for this businesse.

R.

The next point that the Remonstrants note in the English Relation of the examination of the prisoners, is the description of the tortures of Water and fire: which (they say) is finely and prolixly set forth and embelished, to mooue compassion, and to inueagle the Reader, to swallow the rest of the errors and vntruths of the Relation. But that, albeit all torture is in it selfe rough and harsh; especially seemeth so to the English, because none is vsed in England, but in cases of high treason, yet the torture of Water is the most gentle, ciuill, and safe of all other kindes of torture: onely causing an oppression and anxietie of breathing and respiration, but no replenishing and swelling of the bodie, as the English Relation setteth it out, &c. Yea that all that the said Relation deliuereth touching these Examinations, is but a bare narration onely without any prooffe: or at the most is witnessed but by a very few persons, and those such, as the cause concerneth: in which being themselves once iudicially conuicted, they may not now be admitted and allowed as witnesses against the Iudge and his proceedings, against a Court and Councell of foureteene Iudges, persons well knowne to be of worth and vertue; and against their owne confessions legally taken, and confirmed with their owne subscriptions.

For reply to all this: first, for the descriptiō of the tortures, which is here (scoffingly) said to be so laboured & adorned, to moue compassion, & make an easie way for vntruths; it is remitted to the reader to peruse & iudg it. It will be found as voyd of this art of painting, as it is of the vntruths which the Remonstrants mentiō, but specific not, least they should be cleared, as other pretended vntruths are already in this reply. The cause of the English needed no such helpes. The truth of the things deliuered in the whole Relation so shineth in the meere Series and circumstances of the fact, that it disdained those borrowed colours, feathers, and trash, wherwith the Remonstrants haue trimmed vp this their answer. But it is a signe of their penury of matter, that they thus carpe at the style of the English Relation. As for the gentlenesse of their torture of Water, that is also left to be iudged; yea euen by the words of this Remonstrance, that acknowledgeth it to be an Oppression and stopping of the breath: then which what striueth more with the very life of a man, or more forceth ceth the noblest and tenderest parts? It is no maruaile that some of their owne Adventurers tell these Directors in Print, that they can cut of. another mans care, with as little feeling as of an old shoe. But our people that haue tasted of this water-torture of Amboyna, and haue heard those that suffred both there make the comparison, say, that this is more terrible & insupportable for the time, then the torture of fire: how euer the wound of the latter resteth longer in the flesh. The same men also tell vs, (and that vpon their oath) that it is not onely a stiffling and oppression of the breath; but also a replenishing of the body till it be swollen and stretcht, as in Clarks examination is set downe: contrary to that, these Remonstrants here affirme. Yea, but (say they) these witnessses are but a very few, and the same also parties in this cause, and ought not to be heard against a Colledge of Iudges, honest and substantiall men, nor against their owne former confessions. That they are so few, wee may thanke the Dutch that left vs no more. But all that they haue spared vs, agree in one vnanimous and constant testimony. Neither can there in this case be any other prooffe required. What? Would the Remonstrants haue vs prooue these things by the testimony of the Dutch that were employed in this Proesse, and are themselues guiltie of this masqued murder? Should we haue brought a Certificate hereof vnder the seale of Amboyna, with the Governour and his Councils hands to it? What other prooffe is the nature of the cause capeable of, but such as wee bring? And whereas the Remonstrants say here that our witnessses are parties, and formerly conuict in the cause; they seeme to forget, that their owne Acts shew, shew, that some of them were absolued expressely, others neuer condemned. As for the Credit of the Colledge of Iudges, so often repeated, it is already examined in the beginning of this Reply, as also in the answer to the Dutch Relation.

Finally, for the Declarations and Writings of Maister Towerson, Coulson, Griggs, and others, set downe in the English Relation, these Remonstrants seeme to doubt whether any such be extant. And for the strange signes of the storine, the sodaine madnesse and death of Dunkyn, and the new sicknesse at Amboyna, following the execution of the English, which they tearme pretended miracles; they say, that the truth can be witnessed by those that were present and about them at the execution, that no such thing happened. And here they adde, that the English stirre heauen & earth to conceale and couer this detestable fact. But who will suppose (say they) that substantiall people, (men of approued worth and vertue) would shew themselues so impious and inhumane to torture and execute innocent persons? Much lesse must this be presumed of a Court of Iudges sworne and established.

As for the Writings of Maister Towerson, Coulson, Griggs, and others, mentioned in the English Relation (now doubted of by the Remonstrants) wee report vs vnto the Lords of his Maiesties priuie Councell, that haue seene them, and to the friends of the parties that know their seuerall hands; and lastly, to the same Writings themselues still extant and kept to be shewed vpon any occasion. As for the signes related, they are sworne by our men that came thence, and further to be prooued by Letters written, from some that then ser-

ued, and (wee suppose) doe yet serue the Dutch at Amboyna, if they be not since dead, whereof no newes is yet come. But what Witnesse doe the Remonstrants bring, that those things so set downe with their circumstances, and so the easier examined, were not so? The truth (say they) may be witnessed by those that were present and about the prisoners at the execution. But who be those? Why doth not Maerschallcke in his desperate oath (anon to be examined) attest that there was no such matter as the English pretend? Or why shall wee reiect our peoples testimony, and beleue these Remonstrants without any witnesse? But wee shall haue witnesses hereafter. In the Interim then, let the thing so already witnessed remaine for true, till it be contradicted by more and better witnesses. As for the English stirring heauen and earth, not to conceale or couer a detestable fact of their owne people (as the Remonstrance speaketh) but to discouer a most damned practise of the Dutch, and to procure Iustice vpon it, they conceiue they are not to be blamed herein: yea that it is their dutie to moue heauen and earth against them, that haue moued hell against Innocents.

Now for the honestie and credit of their Gouernour and Councill at Amboyna, a string often harped vpon: although it be euident that there is a great difference of the stuffe betweene the Iudges of Amboyna, and all other Iudges in the parts of Christendome: yet the honesty and credit euen of the best Iudges is no sufficient defence for them against such apparant proofes of Injustice, as are extant in this cause, euen in the acts of the Processe it selfe, as is before declared. For the Iudge that in his Proceſſe obſerueth not the order preſcribed by the Law, is reputed as a priuate perſon. Otherwiſe indeed, the Iudge is not without prooſe to be preſumed to haue done vniuſtly: but this will not ſerue theſe Iudges. Neither is any partie accuſed, to be preſumed guiltie, without Indicia or euidence: but euery man to be preſumed good vntill the contrary be prooued. Which ſhould haue mooued thoſe Iudges of Amboyna to haue bene tender and carefull in the Indicijs that were made the pretexts to torture the firſt Iapon: and not to torture a poore man for asking an vſuall and harmeſſe queſtion, yea, and needfull in the place of his ſeruiſe, as is ſhewed in the anſwere to the Dutch Relation. Much more ought they in this reſpect to haue bene tender of taking the extorted confeſſions of the Iapons, for a ſufficient Indicium againſt Maſter Towerſon; not onely in regard of his qualitie, as being the Agent and Cape Merchant for the Engliſh there; but alſo of his innocent and harmeſſe, (yea godly) behauiour at Amboyna, and all his life before. For as he was a man of note, and knowne to moſt men of his qualitie here in England; ſo all that knew him (eſpecially that were well acquainted with him, whereof there is no ſmall number) ioyne and iumpe in this one opinion & commendations of him, that he was of a moſt faire condition and ſweet diſpoſition, harmeſſe, and without ſpleene or gall; and (in a word) the vnlikeliſt Engliſhman that euer went into the East Indies, to be a plotter or practiſer of ſuch a fact, as he was condemned of.

The Remonſtrants hauing thus finiſhed their anſwere to the Engliſh Relation, affirme that by their deduction of Iuly, and this answer, they haue sufficiently iustificed the proceedings of their Officers at Amboyna; neuerthelesse ex abundanti they produce further evidence out of an attestation of Signeur Houtman their late Gouernour in the Moluccoes. Which because it is afterwards againe repeated in severall Articles, shall be there with the rest answered.

v. In the meane time, they appeale to the Lords States generall, whether they haue not by all this giuen sufficient satisfaction and cause to the English Company, to abate and let fall their suit, leauing the blame vpon the Authors of this abominable conspiracie (as they call it) and of their owne misfortune. Neuerthelesse, not daring to goe to tryall of the maine cause vpon these their allegations and proofes, they pray that there may be no precipitation vsed, but a fit respite granted them for the exact enquiry of the truth in the Indies: and that in the meane time, they may haue the protection of the Lords States, and all misunderstanding and contrary deductions may cease; at least prouisionally. For put case (say they) that their Officers be truly guiltie (as the English pretend) yet they must be heard before they can be condemned. And in their opinion (say they) the ground of the Conusance of this cause must come from Amboyna to Battania, and thence hether: and time conuenient being giuen, there will doubtlesse come daily more and more cleare proofes and light in the cause. As for themselues, they at last plainly confesse, that they cannot answer the obiections and circumstances alledged and proposed; but that this must and can be done by them onely, whom the cause toucheth and concerneth: to wit, their Officers at Amboyna.

Here

Here they renounce all the defence and iustification which they haue already made; as impertinent and insufficient. They might haue done well then to haue spared all this labour, and at first to haue left the cause to them whom it concernes, as the English Company by their Letters requested them. As for precipitation in the cause, the English Company require none. But because the Acts of the Councell at Amboyna themselues containe all that can be legally pleaded in iustification of the Officers, (for, if in them there be no iust ground of the condemnation and execution of the English, all superuenient proofes come too late to excuse the Iudges, euen by their owne Lawes) therefore the English Company presume and maintaine, that there is already ground sufficient, out of the same Acts, and out of the Treatie, whereof this Proesse is a plaine breach, for the Lords States generall by an Act of State publicly to declare the Nullity and Iniustice of the Proesse. But for the iudiciall proceedings against the particular persons that haue committed this vnparaleld Iniustice: there may be such order and course taken, as his Maiestie and the Lords States shall finde the nature of the cause to require. Wherein also the greatest care and expedition that can be vsed for the apprehension of the parties, will be no precipitation; considering the manifest proofes of their Iniustice, appearing in their owne Acts, as is before declared.

Having finished their prayer to the Lords States generall, to the effect aforesaid, the scope and drift of all, being onely for Dilation and respit in the cause: yet as it were repenting them of their former feare and declination of a present tryall, they come on a fresh with new proofes, which they affirme to be so strong and vigorous, that they are of power, more then sufficiently to giue their Officers an entire discharge, and to confound their Aduerfaries: and that without helpe of the points before alledged. And to make good these great words, they produce eleuen severall Articles taken by deposition of Laurence Maerschalck their late Cape Merchant at Amboyna, and now returned into Holland, and sworne to the same Articles before the Senate of Delfe the 4. of November last stilo nouo; whose name in this Remonstrance they conceale. Next they annexe the report and deposition of Signeur Houtman their late Gouernour at the Moluccoes, before mentioned. And in the last place, they reapeate some points already by them alledged in this Remonstrance, and so shut vp their whole Worke.

For the testimony of Maerschalck, it is to be considered in the generall; that he is a partie, being the second man of the Councell of Amboyna: and therefore what is before said against the whole Councell, falleth vpon him in his particular with more enforcement. Neuerthelesse, this protestation against his incompetency to be a Witnessse in this cause being thus premised; wee will peruse and examine the particulars of his Attestation: yet with this leaue, a little to inuert the order of the Articles, (but without preiudice of the substance of them) thereby to take all the matter of one nature together, to auoyd prolixitie and needlesse repetition of the same thing in diuers parts of the answer.

The first, second, and third Articles affirme, that as well the Japons as the English, not onely signed their

seuerall confessions with euery of their hands respectiue-ly, but ioyn-ly and seuerally confirmed and persistered in the same, euen out of the fetters and irons, at seuerall sessions of the Councell; yea the English three or foure seuerall times, without retracting or reuoking or changing of any thing: albeit the Governour seriously admonished them to alter or reuoke any thing which they had falsely confessed through paine or feare &c. But that all the English shrinking vp their shoulders confirmed all they had confessed to be true, and craued mercy and not Iustice.

These impudent fictions are answered by that which is already noted concerning the Requisites and Solemnities of the Acts of all Courts of Iustice: which by prescript of the Law it selfe record the passages of euery Session, with the date thereof. But in all the Acts of the Court of Amboyna, (vnlesse they haue giuen a false Copie, which yet were to be taken for true against themselves that so falsified it) there is no mention of any more confession then one of euery prisoner, nor of any freedome from fetters, nor of any such admonition by the Governour as is here pretended. Besides the English that are escaped, as well those that were absolved, as the rest, vtterly deny these seuerall points to be true. Yea the gesture here added of the contracting or shrinking vp the shoulders, being no English gesture, sufficiently refuteth this fiction.

The fourth Article saith, that William Webber one of the Complices confessed he had receiued a Letter from Iohn Clarke, intimating that there was some extraordinary matter and of great importance in hand by the English at Amboyna: and that Iohn Clarke confessed to haue written such a Letter.

The

The confession of Webber touching this Letter, is acknowledged in the English Relation : but whereas this deposition saith, that Clarke also confessed the writing of such a Letter, the Acts themselves wherein Clarke's confession is set downe by the Dutch Actuary, refuteth it, not making mention of any such thing, nor of any question ministred to Clarke touching this Letter, or his meaning by that intimation ; Which would not haue beene omitted, if the Fiscall had not perceiued that Webber had faigned this matter onely to auoyde torture.

The fifth Article being of the same nature with the eighth and ninth, shall be anon with them answered.

The sixth and seauenth Articles recite certaine pretended voluntary confessions of Thompson made before some of the Councell apart : to wit, that he had endured so much torture without confession, because he was often vpbraided by Master Towersson with drunkenesse, and warned that he should not in his cupps discouer the pretended plott. Whereupon he had vowed and sworne to himselfe, that he would not be the third nor yet the fourth man that confessed : what euer torture he suffered. But afterwards he confessed (saith the seuenth Article) that he was glad that God had reuealed the fact, for the sauing of innocent bloud, and that he had doubly deserued death : yet craued mercy. Here let the course of the Dutch in making Affidauit of the pretended voluntary confessiō of Maister Towersson before six of the Councell apart (and entred into the Acts) be considered, as it is truely set downe in the answere to the Dutch Relation : and it will manifestly appeare, that this confession of Thomsons (if any such such had beene) was of much more importance to the clearing of the Dutch proceedings, then those obscure words of Maister Towersson: and so would the rather have beene brought by way of Attestation into the Acts, as the other were. But in the Acts there is no entry of any such confession of Thomson: who also going to the execution, and being reproched to be a Schellam or villaine, openly and boldly answered, that he was as honest as the Gouvernor himselfe, and by and by tooke his death that he was innocent.

The fifth, eighth, and ninth Articles affirme, that Collins confessed all without torture, and being confronted with Maister Towersson before the Councell, auerred his confession, and perswaded him to doe the like; also that Maister Towersson being another time before the Councell with the rest of the English prisoners, reproached them with their drunkenesse and disordered liues, and imputed the discouery of the conspiracie to Gods iudgement vpon their wickednesse: yet that at last Maister Towersson confessed himselfe to be the Author and instigator of the rest, and asked them forgiueneesse.

Of all these matters being farre more pregnant (if they were true) to haue beene the ground of the sentence then any thing entred in the Acts, there is no one word or mention in all the Proceffe, although these things are here affirmed to haue passed before the bodie of the Councell. But it seemeth that Maerschalk (since his arriuell in Holland) is shewed the defects of the Proceffe, and so would supply them by his owne testimony. But he commeth now too late to make new Acts, after the Copie of the Proceffe imparted to the English.

English. In particular, Collins was tortured with water in such sort, as the view of him afterwards made Coulson confesse without torture, as is set downe in the English Relation, and yet auerred by those also that saw him come out as Coulson did. Further, how sencelesse had the speech of Maister *Tower*son beene, to impute the discouerie of the plott, to Gods iustice vpon the bad life of his pretended Complices, and not rather vpon himselfe for being the inuenter and Author of the conspiracie, in it selte more haynous, then any thing he could charge the rest withall? Lastly, it is already sufficiently prooued by more competent witnessses then Maerschalk, that Maister *Tower*son and the rest were neuer together before the Councell, from the first apprehension vntill the last sentence: and that in all that time, he spake with none of the English, but Coulson, Griggs, and Fardo; so impudent is this attestation of Maerschalck, that he vsed the speeches here pretended, vnto Collins and the rest; and that before the Councell.

The tenth Article saith, there was a Letter written by Maister *Tower*son to Coulson, charging him to be the prime and sole cause that mooued him to this enterprise of making himselfe Maister of the Castle: and that the same Letter was in the hands of the Governour of Amboyna.

If this be true, how could Maister *Tower*son make himselfe the first author of this conspiracy, as the Acts and Maerschalcks owne relation in the former Articles present him? How cometh it, that there is no mention of this Letter in the Acts, nor the same Letter or any authentick Copie thereof sent ouer for iustification of the cause, being so pregnant and pertinent a prooffe?

The

The II. Article telleth a tale of Collins his refusing to sit and eate with the Dutch Merchants in their passage from Amboyna to Iaccatra in the shippe, when he and Beamont were sent thither: vpon scruple (forsooth) to eate with such honest men, being himselve a traytor.

This as it is friuolous and of no value in it selfe, Collins being then as a condemned man to stand to the mercy of the Dutch Generall at Iaccatra: so the truth of it is vtterly denied by Beamont that passed with him in the same shippe, and together with Collins did eate at the same Table with the Dutch Merchants without straying of any curtesie for the matter.

But to helpe the testimony of Maerschalk, that sweareth all the former points in his owne cause, and against the very Acts themselues, and all other probabilities: the Remonstrants in the next Article, supply him with a Contestis, beyond exception as they pretend: to wit, Signeur Houtman their late Gouvernour in the Moluccoes. Who comming thence to Amboyna after the execution, heard and saw some things pertaining to this businesse; whereof, (being now returned into Holland) he maketh report and deposition, in sixe seuerall points, viz: First, that it was firmly and without question or doubt beleued at Amboyna generally, and by euery man in particular; yea by himselve also: that the English and Iapons there had truely and in effect conspired the taking of the Castle. Secondly, that the said Signeur Houtman comming through Hitto, George Sherrock (one of the English Complices) fell at his feete, and acknowledged the great fauour that Gouvernour Spent and the Councill at Amboyna had done him in

pardoning his delict. Thirdly, that he was afterwards present at Iaccatra when John Beamont (another of the English Complices) confessed his fault before the Dutch Generall Carpentiere, and craved mercy for the same. Fourthly, that himselfe and diuers others at Iaccatra, had good and sure information and notice, that Beamont freely confessed the conspiracie also to the English President there; but that the English President thereupon lockt him vp close from speaking with any man; thereby to preuent the dishonor of the treason. Fifthly, that the Governour Speult is reputed for a man of worth, honorable and godly, by all that haue conuerfed with him: and the rest of the Councell also, such as cannot any way be doubted or suspected guiltie of so foule a fact, as to accuse or misvse the English, much lesse to put them to death, if they had not beene guiltie. Lastly, that the torture of Water is alwayes vsed by the Dutch in the Indies, and is not so cruell nor dangerous, as other kindes of torture vsed in the Low Countrys, and in all Europe.

First, the English that were saued from the butchery of Amboyna, doe not yet beleue, that Signeur Houtman hath deposed, as is here inferred. For when he was at Amboyna, and laboured to be brought in ex post facto, for the saluing of the businesse; he openly professed: that he would wash his hands of it, and that Harman van Speult had begun it, and Harman van Speult should end it. And this presumption of theirs is further confirmed by the manner of citing this Signeur Houtman, euen in this Article, where his deposition is not simply and clearly alledged; but with this doubtfull variation: Les dires et depositions du Signeur Gouverneur Houtman, &c. Neither is it specified, where where or before whom or when he tooke his oath: which yet is according to the Custome set downe touching the deposition of Maerschallck: to wit, that he tooke his oath before the Senate of Delft the 4. of November 1624. But admit he be sworne to these Articles: let vs examine their particular import. The first is onely of a common opinion and fame that he found at Amboyna, that it was a true treason. Is it any maruaile that the Dutch, that had made the people beleue that the English meant to haue ript vp the bellies of the women with childe (euen of the Natiues) and to make choice by the beautie and feature of the seuerall infants, which to saue and which to slay, had prepared a sufficient rumor against the coming of Signeur Houtman, to winne his opinion to their cause? Next, it is not likely that he spake with any, but those of the Castle: who were most of them parties in this butcherie: and therefore would make no report to him, but what serued their owne turnes. Further, the iudgement being passed against our people, their fact (though neuer done) might be presumed notorious in Law: and therefore no maruaile he and others gaue credit to it. Yet who knoweth not, that much false iudgement happeneth, notwithstanding the notoriety induced by the Acts and sentence? It were an easie matter for a Iudge to answer any Injustice thus. But when the iudgement and the Iudges are questioned of Injustice, the notoriety that themselves haue made is no plea for them. Yet if the Acts containe sufficient proofes for ground of the sentence, then such notoriety may helpe them. But in this case, the Acts shewing that they haue proceeded contrary to Law, inferre their Injustice to be notorious, as is before shewed. For the second and third Articles, concerning Sherrcock and Beamonts confession of their faults extra iudicially, and while they were yet in danger: they are of no moment, to prooue their guilt, much lesse the guilt of those that were executed, of whom these confessions make no mention; nor especially can they giue any succour to the cause of the Governour and Councell for their proceedings: who ought to haue had the grounds of their sentence in the Acts of the Proceffe, before they condemned and executed our people. More particularly, Sherrock indeed confesseth, that with humble obeysance he complained to Signeur Houtman of the Dutches daily reproaching him with treason, and prayed him that he would deal with the Governour Speult, to take order with them for their inciuitie. For (said he) although I had beene guiltie, yet being now pardoned, why should they thus reproach me? Other confession then this, he vtterly denieth to haue made to Signeur Houtman. Beamont also confesseth, that when he came to Iaccatra, being sent thither to stand to the mercy of the Generall; who then told him, that he came thither to die; he was much amased. But when sodainly the Generall in better earnest told him, he forgau him; then he gaue him humble, and open thanks; but made no confession of his fault, nor was by the Generall vrged in the least thereunto. For the fourth point, that Signeur Houtman and others had such notice, as is here pretended of Beamonts confession to the English President; who also clapt him vp for it: it were here requisite that Signeur Houtman (if he haue thus attested) did name his Authors if he will be beleued.

beleueed. For himselfe is but testis ex auditu. In the meane time, not onely Beaumont denyeth these things, but Collins that lodged in the same chamber at Iaccatra with him, auereth, that his restraint and close custody is vtterly feigned; neither did he euer heare any word or inckling of such his confession to the President. Maister Augustine Spalding also then one of the English Councell at Iaccatra, (but now returned into England) giueth the like report. For the fifth point, being the faire testimony of Signeur Houtman touching the person of his brother Gouernor, Van Speult, and his Councell; It is a point of ciuilitie in him, to helpe them with a good word in the generall: but it is farre too light to lay in the scoale against the seuerall and pregnant proofes of their foule Iniustice, before in this reply at large specified, by the witnesse of all our English that were saued (as well those that were absolued as the rest) by cleare circumstances of the whole businesse, and by the Acts themselues of the Councell of Amboyna. Lastly, for the Water torture, it appeareth without Signeur Houtmans testimony, to be vsed by the Dutch in the Indies. The poore Polarones and the English witnesse it with a mischiefe. But to make it lawfull; it should be prooued to be vsed in the Low Countries: as hath bene alreadie shewed. But why doth Signeur Houtman, nor the Remonstrants, in all this discourse, say nothing for the Fire-torture, which was also vsed, and that in most barbarous manner and degree vpon the poore Japans, and diuers of the English?

The Remonstrance hauing thus pressed the testimony of Maerschalc and Signeur Houtman, in the next place (being the 13. Article) telleth vs without any witnesse:

that diuers persons (which the English Relation mentioneth) to be tortured with Fire and Water, were neuer once touched.

If this were true and certaine, it had beene easie for the Remonstrants to haue named the persons touching whom such error is committed. The English Relation nameth none but Johnson, Thomson, and Clarke to be tortured with Fire. Which of these will the Remonstrants denie to be so handled: against such cleare evidence of our part?

The foureteenth Article promifeth, that the particulars and pettie matters (as they are here tearmed) shall be disprooued by the depositions of those that were in presence, and should haue knowne them if any had beene. Therefore vntill they be thus disprooued, (which will neuer be) let them remaine for true; especially being alreadie prooued by the oath of credible persons, and carrying truth in the very circumstances.

Lastly, for the extraordinary signes that happened at the time of the execution, which are here (scoffingly) tearmed miracles, the same are also prooued by oath, and further by Letters written from some of the seruants of the Dutch themselues at Amboyna, readie to be exhibited vpon occasion. And as it had beene a fillie part of the English to haue feigned such matter, so is it no lesse impudence to deny that which so many as well Dutch and Indians as English saw, and knew to be notorious.

r. After all this new charge so confidently giuen, yet the Remonstrants fall off againe, and not desiring to put the triall of the cause vpon these, nor all the rest of their allegations; they returne by way of conclusion to pray the Lords States Generall, that there may be a conuenient respite giuen for the better examination of the whole matter: and to that end that they will mediate with his Maiestie, to content himselfe also therewith.

But the English East India Companie vpon the grounds before at large deduced, doubt not but that the cause will appeare as well to his Maiesty as the Lords States, to be ripe and readie for such an Act of State as is desired, and for the apprehension of the Authors of this odious and execrable Processe, as soone as they, or any of them can be gotten. And then the iudiciall Processe against them may follow, as shall appertaine to so foule and infernall a Fact.
